From the perspective of pedestrians or the tenants of the neighboring houses, what was designed was a small town protected from the bustling urban surrounding, or a pine forest planted right there on the city’s concrete. The idea of a stylized pine forest that springs up on the pavement overnight is sufficiently abstract to be translatable into architectural language; yet at the same time its imaginative qualities are strong enough to evoke the adventure and novelty that accompanies it.